BUILDING BLOCKS FOR RETIREMENT

Asset Allocation

What's The Right Asset Allocation for You?

The right asset allocation for you depends not only on your risk tolerance, but also your time frame. Knowing your risk tolerance can help you decide on an investment strategy that's right for you. Deciding the percentage of your account to invest in the various asset classes is known as "asset allocation."

The right allocation for you depends on your ability to ride out fluctuations in the value of your investments-which depends not only on your risk tolerance, but on how much time you have until you need the money.

Young, aggressive investors may put their savings in relatively volatile stock funds because they won't need their savings for decades-they may be willing to assume more risk in exchange for greater returns because they have the benefit of time to ride out market fluctuations. In contrast, more conservative investors approaching retirement might consider holding more money in more traditionally stable investments, such as money market funds. How you allocate your investments will change over time based on changes in your individual situation.

Below are sample asset allocation that take risk tolerance as well as time frames into consideration. These sample allocation mixes provide you with an idea of how different types of investors might allocate their contributions at different stages in their lives. Of course, these allocations are only examples. The proper asset allocation for your situation may differ.
